Belvidere Hotel, where the reports of the delegates, who had failed to see Cornish and Holmes, were received, and provision at once made for the sustainment of the employes at these works, now idle through their independent action. The achievement of the Eight Hours system to the working classes of Victoria was now complete, requiring only the indomitable spirit of the pioneers, employers, operatives, and the public to generously recognise the true advantages of its consolidation, undisturbed by false and fleeting ideas of economy, and uninfluenced by cupidity and arrogance. How well these ideas have been carried out, may the patriotic members of the fortieth anniversary, whose names we are proud of to-day, live long to tell. The eventful proceedings of this inaugural day were brought to a close by a banquet at the Belvidere, at which Thomas Smith presided, and which was attended by a goodly company of legislators, members of council, including His Worship the Mayor--since known to fame as the Australian Whittington, in reference to the number of times he filled the civic chair of Melbourne--professional gentlemen of all grades of society, employers, and workmen. On the following morning the public breakfast tables were supplied with the usual digestive literature, amongst which a leading article in a Melbourne morning newspaper was dished up hot. A few slices will serve our appetite: -- The Procession And...
